FTE Text Editor Link to official site InfoWorld: FTE is the first IM client that acts as an assistant. How well does it get along with Outlook? Eric Castori: Not bad. Outlook is a standard piece of software, just like FTE. Their users communicate in the same way they've always done. We've seen several IM programs, and they all try to get the users to adopt their own style of communication. But things change, and I think that the best IM clients for people to use are the ones that try to mimic the way they're used to communicating. InfoWorld: What's one thing that's missing or that you think should be added to the product? Eric Castori: While FTE is a very powerful text editor, the creators thought that it lacked a few tools that would be very helpful to a user. So, among other things, users will find it easier to find text and lines in their text documents. InfoWorld: So what were some of the additions that you made? Eric Castori: The creators of FTE Text Editor saw that users wanted better support for documents that they were sharing with other users. So, they made a field that automatically imports the text from other files when you create a new document. You can also edit other people's documents, and in most cases, their features will look better than your own documents. So you'll be able to quickly edit information from other documents without having to re-type it in, which saves time. This is also a really easy way to share your files. InfoWorld: There was one other feature that caught my eye. What was that?
