Stabilization of trismus through dynamic splinting. The majority of patients with facial trauma require treatment by the general dentistry practitioner. Their comprehensive treatment plan, followed by an active patient support program, is a crucial part of the long-term treatment of facial trauma. However, the prolonged symptom duration and inhibition from scars and other factors may make the treatment of facial trauma difficult and frustrating. This case report describes a patient who was treated using a dynamic splinting technique to control the pain, swelling, and trismus, and reduce impairment of function. This technique provides great benefit for patients who have experienced facial trauma and require no more than restricted oral function.

1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a single-layer or multilayer anti-reflective coating, on a substrate such as a semiconductor wafer, that improves the resolution of microlithography used in making integrated circuits.
2. Description of the Related Art The art of integrated circuit fabrication includes, among other processing operations, forming light-sensitive photoresist coatings on the surface of a semiconductor wafer. A light-exposure operation is then used to print circuit patterns in the photoresist layer. A subsequent development step is used to remove either the exposed or the unexposed portions of the photoresist layer. This process leaves the circuit patterns in the photoresist layer. The photoresist patterns can then be used in an etching operation to form conductive or insulative traces and layers, such as to connect individual integrated circuits on the wafer. A problem encountered in the field of microlithography is that light reflected from the substrate being processed tends to degrade the sharpness of the printed images. The reflective properties of the photoresist material determine the degree of reflection from the substrate. Some of the reflected light also interferes with the projection lens. This makes the reflected light appear as an image of the reticle, lowering the resolution of the reticle pattern and the resolution of the pattern printed on the wafer. A technique for overcoming this problem of reflected light has been disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,477,892, issued to El-Damanny et al. on Dec. 19, 1995, where a multilayer anti-reflective coating is used to reduce the light that is reflected from the substrate. This anti-reflective coating has three layers, a bottom layer that is the same as or very similar
