Visual LISP Visual LISP is a programming language and integrated development environment designed specifically for building macros for AutoCAD and is a Visual Basic for Applications add-in. Visual LISP is part of AutoCAD since AutoCAD 2000. Visual LISP has a different syntax and some features from Visual Basic for Applications. AutoCAD Customization User can create custom menu items and toolbars by using any programming language that the user likes. It is done by using some programming language and creating programming codes that are stored in a script file and are called from the Menu or Toolbar. The scripting language can be Visual LISP, Visual Basic for Applications, Autodesk ObjectARX, C++, AutoLISP, Visual Basic or Visual C#. Visual LISP AutoCAD provides a module to create macros. This module is called "Visual LISP". It is used for VBA programming. Visual LISP is a Visual Basic for Applications add-in module. For example, one can create the following macros. Macro 1: Copy the entire active drawing, including all layers, filters and items, to a file. Macro 2: Delete the entire active drawing, including all layers, filters and items, from the drawing database. Macro 3: Open the drawing database and select all layers and deletes them. Macro 4: Build a drawing using all the layers selected in Macro 3. Macro 5: Build a drawing by the same steps as Macro 4, but this time only the selected layers should be built. Macro 6: Restoring all the layers in the active drawing. Macro 7: Remove all the layers in the active drawing and re-add them. Macro 8: Copy the entire active drawing, including all layers, filters and items, to the drawing database. Macro 9: Copy the entire active drawing, including all layers, filters and items, to the drawing database excluding all layers, filters and items. Macro 10: Restore all the layers in the active drawing. Macro 11: Delete all the layers in the active drawing. Macro 12: Build a drawing using all the layers selected in Macro 11. Macro 13: Build a drawing by the same steps as Macro 12, but this

The Canadian Press OTTAWA - Supreme Court Justice Thomas Cromwell says that a court ruling allowing the Toronto Police Service to disclose which charges were used to silence a teen as evidence he sexually assaulted a woman was "a good result". Cromwell says there is no constitutional right to refuse to answer questions about one's innocence or guilt in a criminal trial. The ruling was in response to a request by the man's lawyer to reveal whether he faced charges in connection with his client's sexual assault case. "It was good to see that the Crown chose not to proceed on that line and, in fact, quite the opposite," Cromwell told a news conference after the ruling. "When you look at the broad range of remedies that the court has to deal with, it's not the narrow one, either in terms of investigating a possible offence or in terms of protecting the integrity of the trial process." Cromwell also indicated that the issue could eventually come before the Supreme Court. Crown prosecutor Ann Young said that a man who was charged with two counts of sexual assault in connection with the case against his client should not be able to receive the information that was sought. Toronto police had refused to release that information, saying that disclosure could interfere with a successful prosecution and could impact on the integrity of the trial. "It's not a matter of defence, it's a matter of police and prosecution," Cromwell said. "They've got a very interesting theory that, given the different charges that were laid in relation to the alleged assault, that the evidence in this case... will interfere with the presentation of that theory." Young argued that allowing the disclosure could jeopardize ongoing police investigations and the credibility of the police service. She also said that disclosing the identity of a victim of sexual assault could prompt further sexual assaults. A three-judge panel of the Ontario Court of Appeal last month ordered that a charge laid against a man who was charged with assaulting a woman be unse
