Time-consuming operation to set target values The way in which you target a window is through the built-in crosshair. Note, however, that the target system can be used on window elements as well, which might mess up the design and functionality of a window. This can be completely bypassed by simply targeting the title bar, and not just a random position in a window. By default, every window you target gets positioned to the center. Unfortunately, you need to manually write down the coordinates to position the new window, and this also applies to width and height of the new values, except if you decide to keep aspect ratio. A few last words All things considered, we can state that Inplace comes with good intentions, but it can be a time-consuming process to set the values and target the source window, rather than to simply use the mouse to drag it in place.
