In contrast to conventional vaccines, mucosal vaccines induce effective immune responses and induce systemic immune responses without using invasive administration routes. The transmembrane mucosal vaccine is an attractive mucosal vaccine with few side effects, but the development of this mucosal vaccine is challenging because of the difficulty in inducing mucosal immune responses. Immunization by using virus-like particles (VLPs) is a new vaccination strategy that provides advantages for the development of mucosal vaccines because of their abilities to act as adjuvants and to induce mucosal immunity. In this review, we discuss the current efforts being made to develop more effective mucosal vaccines and describe VLP as a carrier for mucosal vaccines. We also present our strategy to develop a muco-adhesive VLP that can induce effective mucosal immune responses to mucosal pathogens.Q: Retrieving data from a webpage using Java I am making a little website where there is a form on every page (say one for applying at a company for a job or submitting an application). Every time someone submits the form, I want to notify the website owner using e-mail and therefore have to check the e-mail account's inbox at the site's host. But how can I do this? I mean the website requires me to log in to be able to view all the forms. Can I somehow retrieve their e-mail address? A: You don't have to log in to see their form, you just need to GET their form. You can use the basic HTTP get request to retrieve a page. It works by doing
