There is no guarantee that the dream of an economic Britain that floats like a balloon with a strong pound and an inflation rate of zero will materialise in the short term. But the emergence of an empire of property investment by US Americans has started an increasingly hard-nosed debate about the future of Britain's property markets and the relative importance of buying and renting. Many experts say that this is much needed, with many billions of pounds of household wealth tied up in property. But many people fear that it is the wrong time to buy, with Bank of England governor Mervyn King saying yesterday that the UK property market was "a good example of why you don't want to do house-price speculation". A different message is being promoted by the Foreign Office in its "buyers club". The promotion does not mention the word speculation, but the implication is clear – buy in the UK while it is

In (a), solid lines represent the upper bound, while the dashed lines correspond to the lower bound. In (c-e), the top (bottom) lines correspond to upper (lower) bounds. Bounds are based on the coupling constants in Table \[tab:couplings\].[]{data-label="fig:bounds_yb"}](Fig5.eps){width="4.5in"} The time-integrated coupling constants in Table \[tab:couplings\] are calculated by assuming that the clusters are ionized during each pulse period and the electron density is constant at $n_{e}=3.5\times 10^{20}~\text{cm}^{-3}$. However, in actual PIC simulations, we observe higher electron densities at the peak of the pulse; hence, a more accurate estimation of the coupling constants will require that each cell be assigned a specific density value during each time step. The blue-shaded region in Fig. \[fig e79caf774b
