This is true of both your company, and your brand. By having a social media marketing plan for your company, you are able to have one approach for the company and another for your brand. Here are some reasons why having a social media plan for your company makes sense. One Social Media Plan for the Company and a Second Plan for Your Brand By having a social media marketing plan for your company, you are able to communicate effectively with everyone. Your brand can have different strategies for different platforms, different hashtags, and different types of posts. By having a single plan for the company, you will have all the information you need to communicate your message effectively. You will also be able to take advantage of the efficiency and power of having a single platform with a single social media media account. You will not have to learn multiple platforms, nor will you have to monitor multiple accounts. So the big cost of having a company that has multiple social media accounts, is really the time spent on managing all of them. Should You Have a Company Social Media Plan or a Brand Social Media Plan? Many companies have a social media strategy they like to follow. This makes sense. They have a single social media marketing platform, they have various posts across it, and they post on it frequently. When you have a company that follows this strategy, you will have to periodically change things when things get old. You will have to update them when your company starts getting more social media accounts. One other thing with a company that follows this type of social media strategy is that they have a "company persona". If you are posting about technical issues, your social media account should have a professional persona. If you are posting about something fun, your social media account should have a fun persona. If you use the term persona, it can sound cheesy, but it is just a combination of words that convey a concept.
