The aim of this study was to assess physiological responses to submaximal exercise in patients with chronic anterior cruciate ligament deficiency and internal derangement of the knee. Twenty patients with chronic anterior cruciate ligament deficiency and internal derangement of the knee underwent a submaximal exercise test (between 10% and 85% of heart rate reserve) on a cycle ergometer. Venous blood samples were drawn every 15 seconds and were analysed for glucose and lactate concentrations. The patients displayed an initial significant elevation of blood lactate concentrations from rest to 20% of heart rate reserve. Thereafter, lact

Differential signal-guided multiple test designs for correct rejection rates in fixed-sample designs. Biological samples are collected, processed, and then stored. DNA, RNA, protein, or metabolite concentrations in the sample change over time. To understand the biology, it is critical to have measurements made on the samples immediately after they are collected, especially for samples that need to be collected in a critical time period of, for example, an outbreak. Depending on the sample type and the assay, the goal might be to measure concentrations or counts of a targeted analyte per unit of volume. Methods to deal with signals that drift over time might well be referred to as differential signal-guided. Differential signal-guided methods can be applied to time-series data, which can have many different forms. This paper will focus on fixed-sample designs where the data are composed of a single time series with a common fixed start time for the measurement. Time-series data are common in epidemiology and biomedicine, and one example of these data are the serial measurements of antigen levels in an infection. This paper proposes designs that use this type of data and compares them to competing designs. The alternative designs lead to biased inference on the correct rejection rates of the proposed tests in the sense of probability. The significant difference between the proposed tests and the competing ones cannot be explained by a simple interpretation of the data.
