The user dials a telephone number to establish an Internet telephony session. To initiate the Internet telephone session, the caller places a telephone call to the public telephone exchange (e.g., a local telephone company) of the caller. The public telephone exchange routes the call to a soft switch, which interfaces with the local Internet service provider to establish a connection to the Internet. The soft switch forwards the Internet traffic to a gateway (e.g., a BRI connection) that is coupled to the Internet for the Internet telephony session to be established.
