Now he's turned his hand to television in the role of D.L. Hawkins in one of the latest series of Doctor Who. Now known as Lawrence 'Laurence' from the sound of his voice, the South African-born actor worked with the BBC before making the leap to Dr Who, and he spoke to Digital Spy about his new role and his thoughts on Dr Who, the show's 50th anniversary, David Tennant and that infamous Christopher Eccleston episode. "I love working on Dr Who and I'm looking forward to my 50th episode," he told us, adding that he'd forgotten how young he was when he first started playing the part. "When I started I was very young, but now I can say I was old enough to know how much it mattered and how much I wanted to know where it was going. I don't know if I would have cared as much if I'd been a little bit older." Tudyk's arrival in the series brings the total of actors with Doctor Who connections to five, following David Tennant, Matt Smith, Peter Davison, Tom Baker and Sylvester McCoy. "It's exciting," he continued. "You get to play with the other actors, because they're now

Type I collagen distribution, hydroxyproline content, and 3H-proline distribution were studied in different regions of an experimental wound. Collagen distribution in the wound was analyzed by measuring total hydroxyproline and soluble hydroxyproline in electrophoresis-separated single fibers. 3H-proline incorporation into soluble and intact collagen molecules was also studied in single fibers. A close relationship was found between distribution of type I collagen in experimental wounds and levels of soluble collagen, together with 3H-proline incorporation. Exudate of normal skin contained a higher proportion of type I collagen than that of the rest of the tissue and also more soluble collagen, which was not prevented by a wound. There was, however, a marked rise in 3H-proline incorporation in the wound and in the exudate which occurred over a wider range of collagen concentrations than the rise in soluble collagen. The distribution of type I collagen in the wound and in the wound exudate also closely corresponded with that of the major exudate protein. In the wound, the major exudate protein isolated by ion exchange chromatography was shown to be the alpha 1(I) chain of type I collagen.Q: Use tpl for a specific template category I would
