While hepatitis C virus (HCV) is not in itself an infectious disease, it is an important contributor to the morbidity and mortality of a number of disorders. The epidemiology, diagnosis and prognosis of HCV infection are reviewed here. Several studies have focused on the epidemiology of hepatitis C in injection drug users. The prevalence of HCV infection in injection drug users in the United States is highest in the Northeast and lowest in the Southwest. HCV-seropositive drug users from Puerto Rico are more likely to be Hispanic than to be of any other race or ethnicity. In comparison to HCV-seronegative drug users, those with HCV infection are more likely to have HCV RNA and be HBeAg positive. HCV can persist for years without active disease and the majority of chronically infected patients have normal transaminase levels. HCV RNA levels in the liver are strongly correlated with ALT levels; levels greater than 200 IU/L are associated with cirrhosis or death. Interferon alfa can lead to clearance of serum HCV RNA in a minority of patients with chronic HCV infection, but most patients do not respond. HCV clearance is associated with HBeAg loss and HBe seroconversion. A recent study showed that patients treated with interferon alfa can have a sustained response, defined as HBeAg loss for at least 6 months after the end of therapy. Patients who respond at week 12, however, are less likely to respond at week 52 than those who respond at week 24. In addition to immunotherapy, antiviral therapy should also be considered for patients who have cirrhosis. Prophylactic therapy with ribavirin is not recommended for patients who are not heavy drug users, but this approach may be of benefit for healthcare workers and close family contacts of intravenous drug users.in: Role of Epithelial Cells in the Pathophysiology of
