It's not really fair to call this a lead, though, because it is a very narrow one — but that should not be misinterpreted as a lack of enthusiasm on the part of Republican supporters." There are three problems with this reasoning: 1. Presidential races are about turning out the base, not garnering enthusiasm. No other political contest is so thorough-going an expression of grassroots support. From the primaries, to the conventions, to the general election, the entire apparatus of party politics is geared to turn out the right number of voters. From Harry Truman to Bill Clinton, once in the White House, they have depended on the turnout of loyalists to keep their presidencies.

2. The GOP has a lead of more than seven points. The latest "generic ballot" poll by RealClearPolitics finds Obama leading by 7.9 percentage points. 3. Republicans are not the underdog this year. The latest Gallup poll, released on Saturday, puts the GOP at 47 percent and Obama at 42 percent. Thus, while Obama is leading by 3.7 percentage points, most observers of the campaign assume that the parties' contests will be a squeaker. It's true that in this poll, Obama gets slightly more support from voters with college degrees. But as the Washington Post points out, this is the same college-educated bloc that consistently voted for George Bush twice. Even among women, Obama gets only a slight edge, 41.8 percent to 37.8 percent. Yet in the last three presidential elections, women have voted for the Republican candidate by 60 percent to 38.8 percent. Obama's vote margin is the same as his 2008 margin, but it is smaller than the margin by which Hillary Clinton beat McCain, and smaller than John Kerry's margin.
