Introduction: Allergy to gluten has high prevalence in the general population, including children, as well as in patients with autoimmune diseases, chronic intestinal inflammation, or altered intestinal permeability. Moreover, the frequency of cross-reactivity between non-celiac wheat and other gluten-containing grains is high and this can lead to an incorrect diagnosis. It is therefore important to know the rate of gluten consumption and the types of gluten-containing products in population. The aim: To describe the consumption of gluten-containing products, the knowledge and attitudes toward gluten and its role in the development of allergic diseases in a pediatric gastroenterology outpatient clinic. Methods: The survey was administered to all children and adults with suspected food allergy who came for a consultation at the pediatric gastroenterology outpatient clinic in Pescara, Italy. Results: Thirty-nine participants were included in this study c6a93da74d
