Community Warfare would mark the first time since Call of Duty 4 that there would be an entire new map in the campaign. The maps were originally announced as being captured from the wars of the future and one of them was classified. Eventually that map would become Midnight Resistance with an exterior and interior being preserved from the battlefields of two future galaxies. What is used to be the hallway in front of the cave that was due to be the objective of the map would eventually become the base that your task is to occupy in the map. It was the first map to use the fast travel system in the game. In my opinion, it may have been one of the best maps of the series, if not the best. Midnight Resistance featured a set of tunnels that, when explored, lead to a second set of tunnels that lead into a massive cavern. Finally, there is a room that features a body that has unknown upgrades to it and a special Zeta that would be required to access it. Community Warfare was the only map in COD that had faction-specific unlocks for the Blood Ouzo and Predator 2 weapons. It also featured a rare progression for the COD franchise as the players could earn red streaks from zombies, which created a battle mode that would require players to get more points by laying down more streaks than the enemy. 2015 would be a busy year for the Call of Duty franchise, as they would be relaunching the franchise with Call of Duty: Black Ops 4. With it being a reboot of the series, Black Ops 4would see a new direction. Blackoutwas originally a development built as an early concept for Black Ops 3but would actually be the first chapter in a new campaign. While it never made it into Black Ops 3, it would later return in Blackout, now as a full, standalone mode. A dedicated land would be added to the map, it would feature a new map mode called Explore, and Explore was added as a standalone mode. While it would not be the first game to feature this, it is the first COD game that actually transformed an existing map. While maps were generally about offering up a constant race through a battleground, a lot of time is saved by not having to create entirely new maps to accommodate the game mode. Instead, players were given the option to rework maps to accommodate their gameplay. Some of the new features included was the Day-Night cycle and a health system. The use of the health system would eventually be given to everyone and the other feature was actually done on more than one map, in the game, Rushfrom Black Ops 3was given a revamp for Black Ops 4. Just like Blackout in Black Ops 3, Rush was later given an Explore alternative named Rush: Underground. 5ec8ef588b
