In Duchenne muscular dystrophy (DMD), deletion of the DMD gene is the primary cause of loss of muscle function, and is also responsible for the permanent inflammatory state characterised by the presence of macrophages in the muscular tissue. Also called Becker muscular dystrophy or X-linked recessive muscular dystrophy, the condition is characterised by progressive muscle weakness and wasting, which usually begins in the pelvic girdle and spreads to the arms and legs. The standard treatment for DMD is a combination of corticosteroids and mild-to-moderate exercise. The causes of death for the most patients are respiratory- and heart-failure related problems. Additionally, DMD is a progressive and fatal disease. To date, there is no effective treatment for DMD, and it is known that the inflammatory state in the muscle contributes to the progressive deterioration of DMD. Therefore, the treatment to prevent the muscle inflammation would be the ideal approach to delay the progression of the disease.
