Rarity.The invention relates to the use of 3D imaging and data storage for the production of high quality self-consistent three-dimensional models and maps, and also to the modelling of surfaces and objects. There exist a wide variety of methods for three-dimensional (3D) modelling, for example, on the basis of X-ray tomography, computed tomography, magnetic resonance tomography, acoustic tomography, photogrammetry, laser scanning, measurement technology, ultrasonic scanning, and medical ultrasonic scanning in particular. Different methods have different strengths and weaknesses. Some of the methods require the measurement of a large number of two-dimensional projection images (i.e. images) of the test specimen, which are then superimposed in a 3D-imaging system to produce a 3D-model. With ultrasonic scanning, for example, the measurement of a large number

Native and Alaska Natives number about 100,000, of which approximately 32,000 are Alaska Natives. Therefore, Alaska Natives account for approximately 1/5 of the state's population. In the 1970s, before many Alaska Natives were recognized by the federal government as being of Native American ancestry, the state of Alaska reported that Alaska Natives made up 14 percent of the state population, although other sources cited that percentage as low as 1 percent. According to the 2000 U.S. Census, Alaska's population was 556,982, of whom 206,116 were Alaska Natives. Alaska Natives are the largest ethnic group of Native Alaskans. Smaller groups include Inuit and Aleuts. The Native population at the time was roughly the same size as the entire population of Anchorage.

There are a number of communities in the state with large Native populations. The largest are Lake Village and Utqiagvik. These two communities have populations of approximately 7,000 Alaska Natives. Other communities with substantial Native populations include Gambell and Kaktovik. Other communities with Alaskan Native populations of less than a few hundred include Anaktuvuk Pass, Sterling Bay, and Wainwright. Two smaller communities with no Alaska Natives are Yahara and Shaktoolik. There are only two major U.S. cities that have sizable Native populations. These are Anchorage and Seattle. The percent of the United States' population that are Alaska Natives is around 1.5 percent.
