A: Yes, it's possible, but unlikely. First, you don't want to take any private information from the site, this is hacking. This means you shouldn't be sniffing packets, only cookies. Second, if you're looking at the network traffic, you need to be at a protocol level higher than HTTP. That is, you need to be looking at the IP packets. Just looking at the HTTP traffic won't get you anything, as that is just metadata. Your only way to get the data is to sniff the packets and decode the packet headers. Then, if you're looking at only HTTP traffic, there's only a small number of requests that are in a "successful" state. Most of the time, a failed request will get converted to a successful request. Even then, most of those requests will include an "error" code. All these are part of the HTTP protocol, so you're still sniffing at a lower layer than you expect. If you see a "401" response that has a cookie, but does not include a token, then a token was sent to the server and you do not have to extract the token to successfully intercept the request.
